The National Alliance for Eye and Vision Research understands for America's seniors, independence and mobility make life worth living.

And yet for millions of older Americans, diabetic retinopathy, glaucoma and macular degeneration can rob their independence.

That’s why our goal is to increase federal funding for the National Eye Institute (NEI) to help keep seniors’ autonomy from vanishing in the haze.

NEI, a part of the federal government’s National Institutes of Health (NIH), is working to preserve and restore vision through cutting-edge medical research. This cost-effective national investment reduces healthcare costs and ensures the independence and quality of life of America’s seniors.

On behalf of the community supporting eye and vision research, NAEVR commends NEI’s leadership for this vital research into the aging eye. NAEVR is honored to join a united vision community in participating in the White House Conference on Aging.
